Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: ... should be made somewhat up and from you, fishing the portion of the river nearest you first, and then the more distant spots. If possible, the fish should enter the water head downward, as if making a plunge, but this is scarcely possible when a long line is cast. The runs between the weeds should be carefully fished. The bait should not be lifted from the water until brought close to the trollers feet. Forty, fifty, and sixty yards is not an uncommon distance to cast a gorge-bait; long distances, however, are likely to injury the bait, and the less experienced angler casting half these distances is likely to meet with better success. Suddenly the angler finds his bait checked--it may be a weed, possibly it is a fish. A few tugs, gentle, but with somewhat of a wrenching motion, tell that the pike is obtaining a firm hold of the bait; slacken your line in the meanwhile, and see that there is plenty uncoiled from the reel. A slight check may be given to the bait, either to make it appear that the bait is resisting somewhat the treatment it is receiving, or to see if it is a weed or a fish. If the latter, do not hurry him; a few minutes, from five to ten, must be allowed him to gorge the bait, as he generally seizes it in the middle first, and when pounced, he generally moves off to his favorite haunt. If Mr. Bernards hook is used, it may be advisable to strike; but with ordinary tackle, the line may be pulled gently home, so as to allow the points of the hooks to ingratiate themselves quietly into the fishs maw. When hooked, the fish may make violent efforts to escape, and display no little indignation. A tight line must be kept however. Keep him out of the weeds and bushes at any risk, or you will lose both tackle and fish. It will be better ...
